Stanford Global Studies (SGS) is a division of Stanford’s School of Humanities and Sciences that provides an arena for students and scholars to explore our increasingly complex world from multiple economic, political, social, environmental, technological and cultural perspectives.

Dear Friends,

It has been a privilege and great pleasure to return to the Stanford Global Studies Division this year, which, under the extraordinary leadership of Professor Norman Naimark, has become a vibrant center for international and area studies on campus.

The numbers alone speak to our continuing growth. In the past year, we hosted 26 visiting scholars from universities around the world, and sponsored 593 events covering topics as diverse as the psychology of democracy, interracial love in post-Apartheid South Africa, global warming in Bangladesh, and Beethoven’s influence in China. We supported 95 undergraduate and graduate courses to strengthen the university’s offerings on regional and global issues. SGS also continued to provide funding for undergraduate and graduate students to gain valuable skills and experience abroad, sponsoring 116 internships, as well as 268 research and language fellowships. In 2016-17, the first cohort of students graduated with a minor in human rights, and a total of 73 graduate and 72 undergraduate students completed degrees from SGS programs. The interest in regional and global issues at Stanford is high, and we are doing everything we can to keep pace with the demand.

It is also a very exciting time to be at Stanford, where, under the new leadership of President Tessier-Lavigne, a campus-wide process is underway to consider new directions that will shape Stanford’s trajectory for years to come. In order to better position ourselves within the university at this unique moment, we undertook a division-wide effort to articulate major goals and objectives moving forward, both for the individual centers and the division. In particular, we identified several common priorities where a strategic investment by the division could have an impact broadly across the university: investing in a new curricular and co-curricular focus on global competencies to ensure that all Stanford undergraduates leave the university with substantive knowledge about the world, meaningful experiences abroad, and strong language skills; growing Stanford’s global expertise by increasing the number of faculty who focus on regional and global issues, supporting international research, and bringing the best young scholars on global and regional issues to campus as postdoctoral scholars; and innovating in how we extend our reach beyond Stanford, building on the work... we are already doing through our Title VI programs with community colleges and high schools in California. We will continue to develop these priorities as the university’s strategic process coalesces into a new vision.

Of course, none of these activities would be possible without the dedication and hard work of the faculty and staff at SGS, a number of whom were recognized recently by the university for their excellence. Laura Hubbard, Associate Director of the Center for African Studies, received the university’s Amy J. Blue Award, which honors staff members who are exceptionally dedicated, supportive, and passionate about their work; Denise Chu, Program Manager of the Global Studies Internship Program, received the Dean’s Award of Merit for her role in contributing to the success of the School of Humanities & Sciences; and Professor Mike Tomz, Director of the Program in International Relations, received the Gores award — the university’s highest teaching honor.

I am deeply grateful for the contributions of our faculty and staff, and for their desire to help the division broaden its impact across the university. With its expertise and resources on critical regions and global issues, SGS is in a unique position to help the university advance its mission of bettering the world through education and research. I look forward to continuing this work with all of you.

Stanford Global Studies

Last April, Nadia Murad, a Yazidi human rights activist who escaped ISIS captivity, spoke at the annual SGS student dinner, which brings together students, faculty, and staff from across the division for an evening of thoughtful dialogue. Murad, a Yazidi woman from northern Iraq, was kidnapped and held captive by ISIS when the militant group invaded her homeland as part of a campaign that displaced thousands of Yazidis — an ancient religious group. Following her escape, she briefed the UN Security Council in the first-ever session on human trafficking, and in 2016, the UN appointed her a Goodwill Ambassador for the Dignity of Survivors of Human Trafficking. Ms. Murad spoke about her experience as well as her efforts as Goodwill Ambassador to raise awareness of the millions of victims of trafficking, particularly refugees, women, and children. Another priority, she explained, is bringing ISIS to justice in the International Criminal Court: “If we do not bring ISIS to justice, we legitimize them as a force,” she said. Murad also spoke about Yazidi culture and traditions, and following the event — which happened to take place on the Yazidi New Year — students joined Ms. Murad in a video message to wish the Yazidi people a happy new year (pictured below).

Center for African Studies

Known for her tremendous energy and compassion, Laura Hubbard, associate director for the Center for African Studies (CAS), was one of this year’s winners of the Amy J. Blue Award, which honors staff members who are exceptionally dedicated, supportive, and passionate about their work. In nominating Hubbard for the award, students, faculty members and colleagues praised her “tremendous energy and compassion,” her “unfailing generosity of time and spirit” and her passion and commitment to the African Studies community.

Laura Hubbard

Richard Roberts, a professor of history and director of CAS, said Hubbard has transformed the center — “virtually single-handedly” — from a small group of academics into a large and vibrant community.

“Laura nurtures our community even as she maintains a very active scholarly program of lectures, conferences and symposia. Laura even balances our budget and manages to squeeze out of it a wonderful array of programs, a strong African language program and a series of highly competitive grants and fellowships. Did I mention that Laura also teaches and has one of the highest student ratings I have seen?”

SGS Faculty Director Jeremy Weinstein and Executive Director Kate Kuhns said Hubbard’s tireless outreach efforts have created a community that works diligently on behalf of students in all aspects of their Stanford experiences.
In May, the France-Stanford Center for Interdisciplinary Studies hosted a conference entitled “Making the World Nuclear After Hiroshima.” The program brought together scholars from Stanford’s Departments of History and Political Science, as well as the Program in Science, Technology, and Society and the Center for International Security and Cooperation to examine how the world has come to live with the nuclear presence that exists today. Participants started by looking at how the world experienced and responded to the 1945 atomic bombings and then explored what these events came to symbolize for the global policy frameworks of nuclear technology, and what lessons have been learned about the impact of radiation on human health and the environment. The conference revisited these enduring questions in light of new sources and recent scholarship, and identified research areas to pursue in the future.

The past academic year has seen important developments for the Handa Center, both on the Stanford campus and beyond. The center strives to enable students across the campus to pursue their interests in human rights and global justice while completing degrees in a range of disciplines. The launch of the Human Rights Minor in September 2016 marks an important step towards achieving that goal. The first group completing the minor graduated this past June, and 19 students have already declared the minor concentration in its first year.

The Handa Center also launched several new projects in Southeast Asia, including a multi-country project on human trafficking; an initiative to combat legally sanctioned religious persecution and discrimination in Indonesia; assistance to the National Human Rights Commissions of Indonesia and the Philippines; as well as ongoing judicial training initiatives with the Supreme Courts of those countries.

CENTER FOR EAST ASIAN STUDIES

In February 2017, the Center for East Asian Studies (CEAS) hosted the 2017 Pan-Asian Music Festival (PAMF) at Bing Concert Hall. An annual event for the past 13 years, the festival showcases traditional and contemporary performing arts from across the Asian continent. The spotlight this year was on China and Iran. In “Music from Shanghai,” Symphony Silicon Valley joined with Peking opera singers and Western-style opera singers and a chorus to present a broad selection of classical music that traced the history of Western classical music in Shanghai, from the first Western-style orchestra there in 1879 to modern day compositions. CEAS was also proud to partner with the Hamid and Christina Moghadam Program in Iranian Studies to host two concerts, “Singing, Drumming, & Dancing from Iran” and “Enchanting Melodies of Persia,” which featured notable Iranian singers, musicians, and dancers.

TAUBE CENTER FOR JEWISH STUDIES

Last winter, Stanford cinephiles and music lovers enjoyed a special treat: a screening of The Yellow Ticket (Der Gelbe Schein), a silent movie accompanied by a live performance of music specially composed for the film by Alicia Svigals. Dating from 1918 and filmed at Berlin’s Tempelhof Studios, the film starred the legendary actress Pola Negri. In the film, which was released in the U.S. in 1922 under the title The Devil’s Pawn, Negri plays the role of a young Jewish woman from a Polish shtetl who, constrained by anti semitic laws, leads a double life in a brothel while attending medical school in tsarist Russia. Her character falls in love with a fellow student, but their romance is temporarily foiled when her secret is revealed. Through various plot twists, happily, they eventually reunite. The event, which was cosponsored with Theater and Performance Studies; Feminist, Gender, and Sexuality Studies; the Center for Russian, East European and Eurasian Studies; and Music at Stanford, took place in January 2017. Svigals, who is the world’s leading klezmer violinist and a founder of the Grammy-winning group Klezmatics, performed her film score along with Canadian jazz pianist Marilyn Lerner and clarinetist Laura DeLuca of the Seattle Symphony.

THE EUROPE CENTER

In her April visit to the Europe Center at Stanford University, Nicola Sturgeon, First Minister of Scotland and leader of the Scottish National Party, spoke to over 270 members of the Stanford community about Scotland’s place in the world. An additional 4,475 people viewed the talk remotely via live stream. With many Scottish voters choosing to remain a part of the United Kingdom in order to ensure continued membership in the European Union, Sturgeon argued that the June 2016 Brexit vote posed a “fundamental question for Scotland” and that the Scottish populace had a right to decide whether to pursue independence in order to continue to be a part of the European Union. Furthermore, Sturgeon argued that Scottish priorities of inclusivity, equality, openness, fairness, climate protection, and economic prosperity are at odds with a decision to prioritize “immigration curbs above all else.”

Professor Michael McFaul moderated the Q&A session with First Minister of Scotland Nicola Sturgeon during her visit to Stanford in April.

The Abbasi Program held its annual conference “Understanding Turkey: Vision, Revision and the Future” in April 2017. The attempted coup in Turkey in July 2016 and the academic crackdown that followed naturally sparked interest among scholars about the future of the country. The conference brought together leading scholars from across the U.S., Europe and Turkey to share current academic research. Scholars presented on topics including the link between environmentalism and authoritarian nationalism, the July 15 putsch, Afro-Turks, Turkish-German migrants, and Armenian activism in Turkey. “It was a two-day immersion in the most recent critical scholarship on Turkey, one you cannot possibly come across in Turkey these days,” said Dr. Halil Yenigun, one of the conference presenters. “From political economy to culture, art and literature; from the Republican era nation-building policies to current day political symbolism and citizen-making policies — not to mention their casualties and counter currents — several facets of Turkey were dissected through and through. It was timely and remarkable.”

The Mediterranean Studies Forum complemented the conference by presenting a series called “Understanding Turkey Through Film,” which showcased movies in a variety of genres. The series included discussions with three film directors and the U.S. premiere of The Last Schnitzel, a short comedy film banned from an Istanbul Film Festival by the country’s Ministry of Culture and Tourism for its political overtones.

In the fall of 2016, the Colombian government signed a historic peace agreement with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), a guerilla group established in the 1960s, bringing an end to a long standing armed conflict that has left as many as 220,000 people dead and 5.7 million displaced over the last half century. In January, the Center for Latin American Studies co-hosted an event with the WSD Handa Center for Human Rights and International Justice to discuss the legal limitations and challenges of the implementation of Colombia’s peace process. The event featured Santa Clara University Law School’s Claudia Josi, a Swiss-Peruvian human rights lawyer who specializes in transitional justice and international humanitarian law, and Guillermo Ruiz Pava, a Ph.D. Candidate at Colombia’s Los Andes School of Management and a visiting student researcher at the Center for Latin American Studies.

The Center for South Asia (CSA) had the honor of hosting Professor Dipesh Chakrabarty for a series of events in May 2017. Professor Chakrabarty is the Lawrence A. Kimpton Distinguished Professor of History and South Asian Studies at the University of Chicago; Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference is one of his best known works. Using examples from South Asia, his talk “Provincializing Europe in a Warming World” brought together the two distinct areas of critical thinking in the humanities: global warming discourse and postcolonial criticism. Chakravarty offered reflections on questions of colonialism modernity, and modernization as we reconfigure them in a warming world. The lecture was very well attended by faculty and graduate students from various departments and world areas. Professor Chakrabarty also met for smaller meetings and social events with faculty and students.

PROGRAM IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

In February 2017, Ambassador Michael McFaul joined 25 undergraduates from the Program in International Relations (IR) for a special lunch discussion where he discussed the current state of U.S.-Russia relations as well as his experience serving in the Obama Administration. An in-house expert, McFaul is an alumnus of the IR program and received an M.A. in Russian, East European and Eurasian Studies. Currently, he is Professor of Political Science, Director and Senior Fellow at the Freeman Spogli Institute for International Studies, and Senior Fellow at the Hoover Institution. He served for five years in the Obama Administration, first as Special Assistant to the President and Senior Director for Russian and Eurasian Affairs at the National Security Council in the White House, and then as U.S. Ambassador to the Russian Federation.

CENTER FOR RUSSIAN, EAST EUROPEAN & EURASIAN STUDIES

During the 2016-17 academic year, CREEES sponsored or cosponsored a series of talks by artists and activists who addressed the role of art, including poetry, theater and graphics, in times of crisis, especially in the context of the current rise of populist and right-wing political movements in the region and around the world. Graphic artist Mirko Ilić examined neo-Nazi iconography in his talk, “Symbols of Hate.” Marin Blažević of the Croatian National Theater in Rijeka spoke on “Theater that Matters: Dramaturgies of Antifascism.” The Slavic Department hosted Russian and Ukrainian poets, Roman Osminkin, Pavel Arseniev, and Serhiy Zhadan, who held a presentation entitled, “The Powerlessness of Language: How to Write Poetry in Times of Crisis.”

HAMID AND CHRISTINA MOGHADAM PROGRAM IN IRANIAN STUDIES

This year, the Iranian Studies Program celebrated the tenth anniversary of the program’s endowment. Over the past ten years, the study of Iran at Stanford has grown from one class to more than 20 classes, and 290 events with a total attendance of more than 48,000 attendees. Undergraduate students can now pursue a minor in global studies with a specialization in Iranian studies, and receive research funding as well as paid summer internships.

Over the past decade, the program has hosted prominent visiting professors and visiting fellows, including authors, musicians, and playwrights, and has collaborated with more than a dozen programs across campus.

The program is grateful to its donors who have supported and trusted the program and allowed its five major projects to grow and thrive: the Stanford Iran 2040 Project on Iran’s economic future; the Stanford Festival of Iranian Arts accompanied by the 2016 premiere of the Public Art, Public Spaces project; the Science and Society joint initiative with the Laboratory for Behavioral and Cognitive Neurology; and the ninth annual Bita Prize.

The Iranian Studies Program looks forward to continuing its engagement with Stanford students, faculty, and programs, and with the community in the coming year.
Undergraduate Programs

SGS supports undergraduate interdisciplinary majors, minors, certificates and honors programs. Over 158 students were enrolled in the division's undergraduate programs in 2016–17, exploring global, regional and domestic factors occurring in contemporary politics, culture and history. Most SGS undergraduate students study overseas and acquire fluency in a second language as part of their degree requirements.

Within SGS, undergraduate students can major in International Relations or Jewish Studies. Minors are available in Human Rights, International Relations, Jewish Studies, and Global Studies, with specializations in African Studies, European Studies, Iranian Studies, Islamic Studies, Latin American Studies, and South Asian Studies. Honors options are available in International Relations and Jewish Studies. Certificates are also offered by Iranian Studies and African Studies.

Graduate Programs

SGS hosts four, one-year master’s degree programs in African Studies, East Asian Studies, Latin American Studies and Russian, East European and Eurasian Studies, as well as a two-year master’s program in International Policy Studies. A graduate certificate in African Studies is also available. Each aims to provide students with training and in-depth exposure to regional affairs, and offers collaborative student cohorts, involved and supportive faculty, small class sizes, individualized advising, and competitive internship, fellowship, research and travel opportunities. In 2016–17, a total of 186 students pursued master’s degrees in SGS.

“I remember one day in our film class watching Solaris (Tarkovsky, 1972) and being struck with the humanity of our field of study. It’s easy to forget when focusing on history and politics that there is a deep undercurrent of culture and art that defines the Eastern European experience as well. Despite ideological obstacles to artistic experimentation and freedom, resilience and creativity won out. This is just as true for the Ukrainian authors of the 19th century and the protestors of today. From that point forward I tried to make it a point to always consider the human factor, rather than allowing myself to focus solely on political trends and rule from the top, and I take this with me as I start my career.”

Global Internships
The following centers and programs provided placements and funding for student internships around the world: the Center for East Asian Studies; the Islamic Studies Program; the Center for Latin American Studies; the International Policy Studies Program; the Global Studies Internship Program; the Handa Center; the Center for Russian, East European and Eurasian Studies; the Center for South Asia; and The Europe Center.

Most of these centers worked closely with the Global Studies Internship Program to facilitate and fund 90 internship placements. The International Policy Studies Program, the Handa Center, and the Center for South Asia provided additional opportunities, bringing the total to 116 internships that were funded across the division: 97 for undergraduates and 19 for M.A. students.

Global Studies Internship Program

Thanks to alumni and faculty affiliations, the Stanford Global Studies Internship Program secured 90 internship positions in 20 countries, including new locations in South Africa, the United Kingdom, Latvia, and Italy.

For the first time, the program collaborated with Stanford Arts to provide an opportunity for students to intern at Scene and Heard, a theater for inner-city children in London, and teamLab, an interdisciplinary digital art group in Tokyo.

The program attracted applicants from 47 majors, in addition to undeclared students. Student demand continues to grow: the applicant number increased to 411 this year, a 19% increase from last year, and we were able to award internships to 90 students. The following companies provided internships:

Nicolette Grabiec
Product Design ’19, Italia Innovation, Italy

“This past summer, I interned in Italy with Italia Innovation. We were stationed at Fabrica, in Treviso, Italy, about 30 minutes away from Venice. Italia Innovation works as a start-up accelerator, and so I primarily worked with a start-up called Rossi & Rei. Rossi & Rei partners with Italian artisans to create bespoke knitwear, handbags, and hats for a primarily American consumer base. I worked on email marketing, mood boards, styling, and graphic design, and got the chance to see the behind-the-scenes of working in a fashion business. One of my favorite moments was being able to travel to Milan, a fashion capital of the world, to help out with the product photography shoot. I also enjoyed traveling on the weekends to different parts of Italy.”
Nathan Lee
Symbolic Systems ’20, TechHub, Latvia

“I was able to work on projects that will directly impact the growth of the young startup ecosystem here. For example, I worked to establish relationships between local universities and startups in need of tech talent. I was also able to help local startups directly, and learned much about business development in the process. Reflecting on the summer, I’m so grateful for the chance to grow not only professionally but also personally. I was able to befriend Latvians and have riveting discussions about the lasting impact of the Soviet Union on their national identity, and I got to see places of the world I really didn’t imagine I’d ever visit. I saw the stars underneath dense Latvian forests, took long overnight bus rides to Estonia and Lithuania, and saw the sunrise from an island off of Finland.”

Ewea Tseumah
International Relations ’19, Scene & Heard, England

“I had the opportunity to go to London for the first time to work for a youth empowerment theater nonprofit for nine weeks. I participated in all the children’s performances and assisted with the writing weekend. I’ve always loved theater and have often considered working for a nonprofit after graduation. The experience was truly eye-opening and helped give me more clarity about my career interests. I loved that I was able to spend my summer working with inner-city children and helping an organization that does such good work for its community.”

Molly Montgomery
International Relations ’18, CNN, India

“My internship with CNN in New Delhi, India, was certainly a once in a lifetime experience. I learned so much about how news is created, written, and produced, and gained valuable experience living on my own in India. I found it to be incredibly empowering — especially as a woman — and returned to the states feeling nearly invincible with the mentality that if I could live alone in one of the craziest cities in the world, surely, little could phase me back home — and I was right. Also, it is really easy in these increasingly nationalistic times to become insulated and unaware of life outside the U.S.; I am grateful that this program pushes us to maintain a global perspective and shows us what international business cooperation looks like. It was an experience that will be with me forever!”

Andrea Villarreal
Management Science and Engineering ’18, Newfoundland Capital Management, Brazil

“This past summer I worked in Sao Paulo, Brazil, doing financial modeling and market/industry research under the supervision of a Stanford alum. The firm had a small staff, so I was entrusted with responsibilities that helped me learn a lot. I also took time to travel and get to know the city on the weekends, which was fun and eye-opening!”
Global Perspectives Grants

A generous gift from the Friends of Stanford University in Taiwan enabled the Stanford Global Studies Division to award 24 “Global Perspectives” grants to fund graduate student research abroad.

Karen Camacho
Center for Latin American Studies

“I was curious to learn about Mexico’s current efforts to revitalize Náhuatl, the indigenous language most widely spoken in Mexico that is also at risk of demise. I visited a Mexican nonprofit dedicated to teaching, research, and the revitalization of indigenous languages and cultures in Mexico, and interviewed its employees. I found that they encourage participants to conduct their own research and publish works in Náhuatl to demonstrate how this language can be used in modern-day life. They also informed me about the importance of reaching out to the youth who are the least likely to use the language nowadays. While in Zacatecas, I also participated in an intermediary Náhuatl course and noticed that my skills exponentially improved. Coming back to Stanford, I feel even more empowered and motivated to continue my Náhuatl studies. I also feel a deeper understanding and sense of purpose for the work I am doing.”

Holly Moulton
Center for Latin American Studies

“For my research, I visited several national parks and agricultural regions in Colombia to study the effects of climate change on indigenous communities, rural villages and farmers. Through informal interviews, I learned how farmers, national park employees, indigenous communities, and other land stewards view climate change and periodic strong weather events like El Niño & La Niña. It is critical for area studies to seek out on-the-ground experience; your generous donation allowed me to achieve this and gather valuable firsthand anecdotes to enrich my capstone project.”

Ross Conroy
Center for African Studies

“I am researching the French military mission during the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, called Operation Turquoise. During this research trip I was able to access a significant amount of new data, mostly through the various archives and libraries concerning the genocide in Rwanda. It was an incredible opportunity for me to visit some of the memorials and massacre sites where the French were implicated and hear from witnesses directly about what happened. Nothing I could have done on Stanford’s campus could have been that moving and powerful, and was such a contribution to my research.”

Hokuto Asano
International Policy Studies

“I examined how Japan and India could collaborate with each other to work on infrastructure projects in Sri Lanka. In Colombo, Sri Lanka, I conducted interviews with the Embassy of Japan, the Japan External Trade Organization, the Japan International Cooperation Agency, construction companies, as well as investment and consulting firms. Through these meetings, I believe that I succeeded in identifying a project on which Japan can work with India. I believe that Sri Lanka can be a bridgehead for Japanese companies in South Asia, and based on the information I learned, I will think about how Japan can collaborate with India on infrastructure projects in Sri Lanka.”
The U.S. Department of Education has designated three SGS centers as National Resource Centers (NRCs): the Center for East Asian Studies, the Center for Latin American Studies, and the Center for Russian, East European and Eurasian Studies. Supported by Title VI of the Higher Education Act, NRCs strengthen access to training in the major languages of their respective regions, broaden area studies training across all disciplines, and pursue innovative collaborations with other educational organizations and local communities.

As part of their community engagement effort, the three NRCs collaborate with other Stanford centers, including the Stanford Program on International and Cross-Cultural Education and Lacuna, to establish the Education Partnership for Internationalizing Curriculum (EPIC). EPIC focuses on strengthening the internationalization of curricula and the professionalization of language instruction at community colleges and K-12 institutions.

This past year, EPIC hosted a second cohort of community college fellows from Bay Area schools to incorporate global themes into their course materials. The culmination of the fellowship was a symposium in May, which drew over 80 California community college faculty and administrators, and featured presentations from the fellows, as well as a keynote presentation by Stanford Global Studies Director Jeremy Weinstein.

In addition to the annual fellowship program, EPIC once again collaborated with the Graduate School of Education’s Center to Support Excellence in Teaching (CSET) and the Abbasi Program in Islamic Studies to offer a series of Saturday workshops for middle, high school, and community college educators to learn how to incorporate the study of Islam into history, social studies, arts, and related subjects.

EPIC also teamed up with CSET over the summer to offer a set of week-long professional development courses for middle and high school teachers. One course focused on the history of the Americas, including nation building and the Mexican Revolution, and featured lectures from scholars at El Colegio de México — one of Mexico’s leading universities. Another course examined the First World War from the perspective of different world regions, such as Africa, the Middle East, as well as East and South Asia. In both classes, teachers received lectures, visited the Hoover Institution Library & Archives, and discussed how they could implement the newly learned material and resources into their own lesson plans.

The three NRCs are also recipients of another U.S. Department of Education grant to provide fellowships for Foreign Language and Area Studies (FLAS). The FLAS fellowship program complements the NRC program, providing opportunities for outstanding undergraduate and graduate students to engage in area studies and world language training.

In 2016-17, these centers provided 24 students with more than $795,000 in funding to pursue fellowships for area and language studies, including Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Náhuatl, Polish, Portuguese, Quechua, Russian and Ukrainian.
The 405 faculty affiliated with SGS centers and programs represent every school at Stanford — Business, Earth Sciences, Education, Engineering, Law, Medicine and Humanities and Sciences — as well as many of Stanford’s centers and institutes, where multidisciplinary research extends beyond the scope of any one of the university’s schools.

Below is a snapshot of books published by our faculty this past year.

RESEARCH

SGS facilitates research and data collection across fields and national boundaries, enabling the next generation of scholars to creatively address regional and global issues to advance our understanding of the world. In addition to providing research fellowships, SGS programs and centers host collaborative research initiatives, produce research reports, and facilitate student research.

Iran 2040

The Stanford Iran 2040 Project is an academic initiative that serves as a hub for academic researchers all around the world, particularly the Iranian diaspora scholars, to conduct research on issues related to the future of the Iranian economy and evaluate their possible implications in a global context. Hosted by the Iranian Studies Program, the project released three reports this past year, analyzing the future of Iran’s oil and its economic implications; land and precipitation for agriculture; and natural gas, electricity, and renewable energy.

International Trial Monitoring

As part of its international trial monitoring program, the WSD Handa Center for Human Rights and International Justice produces reports throughout the year. This past year, they released a report analyzing the final judgment of Case 002/01 at the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, which was established to try the senior leaders of the Khmer Rouge for crimes committed during their reign from 1975 to 1979. Another Handa Center report assessed the early termination of the proceedings in the case against William Ruto and Joshua Sang at the International Criminal Court, which addressed the post-election violence in Kenya from 2007 to 2008.

Effects of Alzheimer’s and Parkinson’s Disease

Owen Phillips of Stanford’s Department of Psychiatry visited the Université Toulouse III/INSERM in France as part of the France-Stanford Center Visiting Junior Scholar Fellowship. Dr. Phillips’ research project focused on the negative effects degenerative diseases such as Alzheimer’s, Parkinson’s disease, and Multiple System Atrophy have on the brain’s connections. He employed advanced neuroimaging and sophisticated data analysis methods he developed to study the potentially highly vulnerable “superficial white matter” — which is a complex high plasticity area of the brain where information is transferred over short distances. This project is significant because no one has looked at the superficial white matter in Parkinson’s or Multiple System Atrophy. This work led to striking findings, which demonstrated advanced degeneration of the superficial white matter in Multiple System Atrophy, but not Parkinson’s disease.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty

For her International Relations honors thesis, Yegina Wang researched why some states decide to sign, ratify, and then violate the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT). Through evidence provided by her analysis of large-n data sets and case studies of North Korea, South Korea, and Iran, she hypothesized that international isolation plays a key role in explaining a leader’s decision to cheat on the NPT.

Postdoctoral and Visiting Scholars

This past year, SGS centers and programs hosted 26 visiting scholars, 3 postdoctoral fellows, and 12 visiting student researchers from 21 different countries to build global expertise on campus. These visitors strengthen the university’s intellectual and educational environment by delivering lectures, conducting research, mentoring students and teaching courses.

Charles Chang, the 2016-17 Chinese Studies Postdoctoral Fellow at the Center for East Asian Studies. Chang, who is originally from a small city called Yibin in China’s Sichuan Province and received his Ph.D. in Environmental Studies from the University of Wisconsin-Madison, studies big data and technology in China.
EVENTS

Events are at the heart of building the Stanford Global Studies community. By inviting scholars, performers, and other luminaries to speak and collaborate with our faculty and students, SGS events instill deep curiosity and knowledge about other peoples and cultures.

In 2016–17, SGS programs and centers brought together over 34,000 attendees, who enjoyed nearly 600 events. Lectures, conferences, workshops, films, concerts, plays, and other events connected faculty, students and the general public.

The international area centers and programs that make up SGS have influenced the career decisions of thousands of students. Our alumni are truly global. They have built careers around a diverse range of interests and value many aspects of their global education since leaving Stanford. SGS provided many of them with the skills needed to be policymakers, diplomats, entrepreneurs, journalists, politicians, researchers, teachers, scholars, and global leaders. Below they reflect on their academic and professional experiences.

Andrew Gee
Director, Albright Stonebridge Group
M.A. East Asian Studies ’15

“There is no better place to study Asian foreign policy and political economy than at Stanford. Taking advantage of the highly interdisciplinary nature of the M.A. program at CEAS, I was fortunate to take not only advanced foreign language and area studies courses, but also extremely useful courses at the law school, GSB, and IPS program — all of which prepared me well for my recent career growth and current role managing Asia engagements at a premier boutique consultancy that advises Fortune 100 firms on business strategy and regulatory challenges in emerging markets worldwide. In particular, the intensive foreign policy seminars I took with Condoleezza Rice, Anja Manuel, Alice Miller, Michael Armacost, and Thomas Fingar, pushed me to my intellectual limits, and forced me to develop razor-sharp critical and analytical thinking, reading, and writing skills that I now use daily in my work. Undoubtedly, my two years at Stanford offered unmatched intellectual rigor and reward — and provided far more gifts than I had ever anticipated, not only in terms of knowledge and skills, but also in terms of a global network and institutional brand name that continually open doors.”

Alina Utrata
2017 Marshall Scholar
Human Rights Minor ’17

“The Handa Center became one of the most important aspects of my undergraduate career at Stanford. From when I first walked through its doors sophomore year, the center has been an incredible resource to me. But more than that, it has become an academic home for me — a place where I can always visit for advice or to talk through some aspect of my honors thesis. Its staff and affiliates are now some of my closest mentors at Stanford.”

Gloria Kyallo
Program Assistant, Alliance for HOPE International
M.A. African Studies ’16

“CAS taught me that life is a celebration and community is at the heart of that celebration. I carry these hallmarks of CAS to work everyday at Alliance for HOPE International and hope to inspire those around me to celebrate one another, as we think critically about problems we aim to solve.”

Gladis Xiloj
B.A. East Asian Studies ’17
Global Studies Internship Program

“As a first generation college going student, I didn’t really consider interning abroad financially feasible until I found out about the SGS internships. My internship at the Asia-Pacific Centre of Education for International Understanding (APCEIU) in South Korea exposed me to Korean working culture and taught me that I could thrive while working abroad. Working at APCEIU also encouraged me to choose my major, East Asian Studies, and to pursue a career in diplomacy. Thanks to the confidence and experiences I gained through my internship, I am now in Seoul, South Korea, starting my three-year M.A. program in International Development and Cooperation at Korea University. Both in graduate school and in my future career, I am confident that I can contribute new ideas and discourse as a result of my immersive experiences in South Korea.”

Gina Shalavi
YouTube Public Affairs Manager, Google
B.A. International Relations ’12

“The International Relations Program requires a diverse range of coursework and experiences that help individuals acquire an invaluably wide skill set applicable to many career paths. Having the tools to think critically, write eloquently, and analyze effectively not only prepared me for the professional world, but every day life.”

The Stanford Global Studies Division extends sincere appreciation to our contributing alumni, parents, students, and friends for their generous support. Financial support provides core funding to strengthen our existing programs and help create new ones where needed, enhance interaction among faculty and students, and facilitate collaboration with other university programs. Funds are focused on activities that impact the broadest range of faculty and students and offer high leverage by encouraging communication and collaboration. Such activities include curriculum development; seminars, symposia, and conferences; visiting scholar programs; development of research networks linking internal and external faculty and students; research initiatives on key topics; and direct financial support for our students — the next generation of outstanding leaders, scholars, and policymakers.

For more information about working with us to enhance global studies initiatives at Stanford, please contact Scott Sugiura, Associate Director of Development at: ssugiura@stanford.edu or (650) 723-1208.
