About the Program

This competitive program brings together a cohort of ten California community college faculty and academic staff from various disciplines to work with Stanford staff for one academic year on self-designed projects aimed at developing global competencies and awareness amongst community college students.

Since 2010, Stanford Global Studies has partnered with community colleges to bring together faculty and administrators committed to developing global and international studies. Fellows will join a growing network of EPIC alumni from across the state who are developing innovative programs to internationalize curricula.

The year-long fellowship includes:

- A three-day summer intensive workshop at Stanford University in August (workshop may be held remotely depending on the evolving nature of the COVID-19 pandemic).
- Virtual monthly seminars that offer fellows the opportunity to work collaboratively on projects and explore cutting-edge research in global studies with Stanford faculty and staff. Fellows will develop curricular materials and programs to implement in their classrooms and home campuses.
- A presentation of project outcomes at an end-of-the-year symposium in May that brings together faculty and administrators from community colleges and universities committed to fostering global studies.
